Currently retiring in this beautiful rural area but still handling business that requires internet as a tool and as well as personal usage. The other area lived in (much more populated) is equipped with internet that is high speed. But I remember the days of trying to run Construction business without reliable speed and it was a real inconvenience that resulted in much longer time to complete daily computer tasks. Farmers and rural residents are just as dependent on these services as they provide essential products to America's cities and citizens. Time is a precious commodity, especially for rural residents as even the basic necessities are not just a few blocks away or around the corner. Farmers and the various service industries that residents in the rural areas rely upon would find this upgrade very useful in my opinion. I appreciate your consideration in this matter. Respectfully....
